Leading mental health organisation Aware, has announced The Future of Depression & Bipolar Conference, taking place on Saturday 12th October 2019 at University College Dublin. Founded in 1985, Aware provides support, education and information to individuals, families and communities impacted by depression, bipolar disorder and related mood conditions.

At Aware, we believe that those with depression and bipolar disorder, their families and loved ones have much to hope for the future. With advancement in social understanding of their experiences and ever more advanced means of treatment and intervention, we have come a great distance over recent decades. But we have further yet to travel. Aware's 2019 Conference focuses on bringing together healthcare professionals to look to "The Future of Depression & Bipolar Disorder", concentrating on novel approaches, further developments in existing therapies and additional means of understanding depression and bipolar disorder. The conference aims to provide attendees with an updated scientific and clinical knowledge regarding how therapeutic development, technology and novel pharmacological and psychological therapies will push the frontiers of clinical practice, both now and in the years to come.

Outcomes of the day will include attendees being more informed of the current research underpinning future clinical developments, resulting in improved patient care over time. The day will also provide improved awareness of different currently available clinical and community based services for those with depression and bipolar disorder and how referring patients to these services can help improve their outcomes.

Overall, the Aware 2019 Conference provides a significant opportunity to develop an updated perspective on depression and bipolar disorder that will inform and contribute to clinical practice and outcomes.
